In experiments on rats the effect of aldehydic products of lipid peroxidation on the blood coagulation system has been studied. It has been ascertained that these products under conditions of intravascular synthesis by the body and in the blood bring about an increased intensity of the blood coagulation process in the blood plasma which is accompanied by a lowering of the anticoagulant activity of the blood cells. Thus, the results of the studies have demonstrated the presence of a correlation between the intensification of the lipid peroxidation processes and changes in the blood coagulation system.Ongoing research and development work is currently underway to use the ocean’s winds as an alternative energy source. But many of the concepts for this technology are unproven, and the process is complex. Murtaza Hussain, the founding director of the MIT Energy Initiative and director of the Advanced Battery Technologies project, says this lack of progress
