Until now, working with video on the Web has been somewhat awkward, largely because of the odd formats used. Toolkits like Adobe Fireworks handle their video files with very specific functionality in mind, so the effect tends to be rather different than what you might ordinarily expect. Adobe has opted to make those limitations go away, and that requires a change in how video is dealt with in many Adobe CS products, such as Photoshop. This is a strength that can also pose a headache if you're a novice user of apps that were only flexible in an inflexible way. Adobe has created their own "video" format, which refers to a series of data bits that are stored as a color image. It isn't really a video format at all, but rather some combination of six or eight R, G, B and A bitmaps that compose the actual image in the RGB colorspace. This is the same storage mechanism that's used in still image formats such as JPEG, TIFF and PSD. In order to do this, Adobe has changed its underlying structure in Photoshop and Illustrator by using a color space, better known as embedding. This is a process whereby the information for the image is sent to a temporary area on your hard drive in the form of a compressed, easily-readable bitmap. The result is a file that is filled with raw image data, saving screen space and corresponding disk space compared to more character-based formats like JPEG. In addition to being more efficient in terms of disk space and network bandwidth, the new file format also makes it easy to submit the file to a server, allowing for file-sharing and link sharing as well as later use by apps like InDesign and The Adobe Applications.
