I don't know how all Adobe engineers feel right now, but I personally feel quite proud of the many improvements and new technologies Lightroom have gained over the years. Hopefully, Adobe will continue to release innovative new features that make their popular RAW converter and image browser even more appealing for new users all the time. I guess it all comes down to how the interface looks and feels to the user. There are, after all, millions of Photoshop users who have been using it since the beginning. All of the technical innovations that happen contribute towards making Lightroom more intuitive and productive, so Adobe has a hard job to ever catch up in that department. There was a time when I missed the kind of Photoshop features that Lightroom doesn't have. But these days I don't miss them. In fact, I find them to be rather less necessary because Lightroom does so much in the background. Sure, it's easy to use Lightroom as a standalone image browser, modifier, and organization tool but it is also now very powerful in many areas of the workflow. A great inclusion was the improved layer panel. I have dealt with Photoshop's LS Power Panel feature in the past and was reasonably happy with it. But I love Lightning Panel because it's more streamlined and useful. I can actually name a bunch of really useful tools right from the panel that I did not know existed before. However, I still miss Photoshop's file-level image browsing capabilities. It would be convenient to be able to share images in browser and browser view, view the images at the same time, or preview multiple images side-by-side. Also, if you make changes to an image through the browser, you would ideally be able to export the modified image in the browser view. With Quick View, I realize that this is possible right from the browser, but I am not sure about editing in the browser.
